

It is difficult to understand why law enforcement and the Commission would think that wiretapping methods used in the 19th century telephone would be at all effective in today's encrypted and packet-switched world. This regulation has strong potential for abuse and invasion of privacy for ordinary citizens while criminals and terrorists with even basic computer skills can easily communicate unfettered through a wide variety of secure and untappable means. It is my belief that such regulation is clearly not in the public interest, convenience and necessity.
